Capital and Labor.

Capital and labor are still at war.
The details of a strike here, a lock-out there, a demand for an advance in wages from a committee of some labor union furnishes a goodly portion of important reading matter in our daily journals and magazines, with no hope of arriving at any solution of this most difficult and disturbing problem.

There is nothing in the commercial world more timid than capital, and very few things more uncertain than organized labor. Where time is the essence of a contract, the contractor assumes a great risk. He may cause a strike by not complying with the demand of an advance of wages, or his men may be ordered to walk out in sympathy in order to bring to terms some other contractor who is operating in an entirely different line. To the writer it appears that the employer and the employee's interests are identical and there is some reason in believing that in the not very distant future amicable relations will exist between them.

For an illustration I will take the Miners' union and the mine owner. I have some knowledge of both sides of the question and am absolutely certain that if the foundation of a miners' union was skilled labor, and the scale of wages graduated, and instead of trying to have every laborer who works in or about a mine become a member of a union, require the applicant first to be taken on probation, say three months; then if the applicant has proved himself to be a miner, he should be admitted to full membership, and his certificate should state that John Doe is a first class miner, class A, $5 per day, or class C, $3 per day, as the case may be.

The committee to pass upon the value of the member's labor should themselves be intelligent, first class miners. They should take into consideration the price of the metal mined, transportation, cost of supplies, etc., and fit the wage rate of each member every three months. There is no reason why some first class single handed hammer men should not earn 75 per day, while there are some men, members of a union in good standing, who are worth less than 25 per day. A uniform scale of wages such as has been and is now in vogue in miners' unions, must necessarily produce a bar to the intelligent miner's receiving recognition and reward for skilful and honorable labor.

The reason is obvious. Under the present system a first class miner who knows how to put in his shots to the best advantage, knows how to catch up running or swelling ground, how to timber, etc., is certainly worth more to the mine owner than a new beginner, but the very worst feature of the whole system for the miner is the lack of incentive. There is nothing to encourage the thorough miner to do his best, and there is no reason why the new beginner should try to advance in his new profession. There is no more reason in having a uniform wage for miners than there is in having a uniform value on all horses. A miners' union founded upon the principles that I have outlined and controlled by miners who desire to be fair, will soon find that when one of their members presents his certificate to the manager of a mine who desires to employ more miners, and if his certificate calls for 55 per day the chances are ten to one that the manager would prefer to have a 55 man than to have a 35 man. There would be a chance for progression all along the line and the 35 man this year may be in the 55 class next year.

When the miners' unions are once established on these lines there will be no questions asked by the manager when the applicant presents his certificate. All miners cannot expect to reach the top, but those who are able, capable and willing, should not be held down by an arbitrary, uniform scale of wages.—Western Mining World.
